

Merchant Hammy

The whole Tundra knows Hammy's manufactures, especially his delicacies. Every day the locals come to his famous confectionery shop: for lingonberry marshmallow, cranberry jam, and sugar-coated cloudberryes. Hammy carefully preserves the recipes inherited from his ancestors, the founders of Tundra. Like other merchants, Hammy barter his goods in the middle and southern lands — where northern berryes are considered a curiosity and are highly valued. The merchant community knows that with Hammy as viceroy of the tsar, new stores will open outside of Tundra, spreading the good news and replenishing the treasury.

Duchess Elisabeth

Elisabeth's noble family had accumulated wealth and influence over many generations of diplomatic service. So the young perceptive Duchess decided to follow in the footsteps of her ancestors. She visited many distant lands, spreading the word of Tundra's success. Thanks to Elisabeth the kingdom is full of new talents — many move to the north, not afraid of its harsh conditions. Elisabeth's eloquence and openness are admired by the entire nobility. There is no doubt that her temporary rule will inspire the whole of Tundra and attract even more hardworking and talented inhabitants.

Abbess Sophia

Wise and educated, the clergy collect and preserve the most valuable manuscripts — the history of Tundra, its creative and scientific heritage. For a long time these manuscripts were available only to parochial schools, but the abbess Sophia changed everything. She opened a printing house at the temple to print the most important works, so that everyone could acquire the knowledge. Since then, in every house and in every hut there are reading evenings and wise conversations. With such a viceroy of the tsar, the whole of Tundra would strive for development and the common good — that is why the class unanimously supported Sophia.

Commander Polkan

Polkan dreamed of making his state large and rich, so he joined the Tundra Border Guards. With them he accompanied merchants and diplomats on their distant journeys and explored deserted territories. Fearless by nature, Polkan proposed a plan to develop the uninhabited northern lands — closer to the icy sea. Thus, the Tundra became more accessible, as well as developed a fishing industry. And Polkan was given the rank of Commander. Since then, the entire military class appreciates his bravery and ingenuity and hopes that he will become the tsar's viceroy.
